

Whole Language Philosophy: Its Practical and Effective use in the Classroom

Joseph C Veramu

We are all familiar with the Grammar Translation Method of teaching, where students are expected to memorise grammar rules and long lists of words with emphasis being placed more on the written rather than the spoken language (Brown, 1987).

I can still vividly remember my school days where oral drills were the order of the day in English lessons. Like drugged zombies we would shout, "The flower in Sorowaqali's hand is white." This would go on for fifteen minutes followed by an exercise on "filling in the blank spaces using the correct prepositions" totally removed from the previous oral drill or Sorowaqali's flower. I even wrote a short story (Veramu, 1989: 76-77) based on my experiences as a primary school pupil. Here is an excerpt from it.

In one week [the teacher] would ask the students to bring tea for lessons in English Grammar. Each of the forty students would bring a little tea which he would place in three jars, one small, one medium and one large. He would then point to the bottles and ask, "What are these?" We would answer, "Those are three jars of tea." "Are they of the same quantity?" Again in a chorus we would say, "No, they are not." After ten minutes of this meaningless grammar lesson he would beam with satisfaction, give us a written exercise from our Oxford reader (totally different in nature from what we had been doing) then place the jars of tea in his bag for his personal use. The following week it would be sugar, then salt and then rice.

Fortunately, the development of the whole language philosophy to language teaching and learning has breathed fresh air into our Pacific classrooms.

Whole language is an approach to teaching communication skills—literacy—in a holistic natural way. Language is a living process—there is joy in learning when language is taught in meaningful ways (Zarry, 1991).

A good example of a whole language lesson was demonstrated by Mary Nauer (Robert Louis Stevenson School) at Apia, Western Samoa. This was during the EDC53 Summer School where students had to prepare a short lesson of 15-20 minutes.

Her lesson was for 20 minutes and the resource she used was the story book Mau'i and the Sun for children of Year 5.

The teacher started off her lesson asking children to mime certain activities like:

- Father working in the taro patch.
- Mother cooking tea.
- Boy preparing an umu.

She then introduced the legend Mau'i and the Sun.

She asked the children to talk about legends they knew that told of "special events or happenings". They talked about some well-known legends of Samoa.

She then showed the book Mau'i and the Sun and proceeded to read the story. It was read clearly and with feeling.

After this she smiled and told the children that she would retell the story but this time the children would act out certain parts of the story as it was retold.
