

USE OF MICROCOMPUTERS BY YOUNG CHILDREN
WITH SEVERE DISABILITIES:
A BRIEF REVIEW OF STUDIES AND THEIR IMPLICATIONS<sup>1</sup>

HOWARD P. PARETTE, JR. AND ALAN VANBIERVLIET

University of Arkansas at Little Rock

Summary.—Microcomputers increasingly are being employed with young children having disabilities, although little research has been conducted. A review of available research suggests a variety of questions must be addressed by professionals in rehabilitation to optimize potential applications of this new technology with these children.

The dramatic increase in the development of microcomputers has far reaching implications in our society, particularly for persons with disabilities. Use of microcomputers can greatly enhance the quality of life for these individuals, facilitating greater interaction and control over the environment (1, 5). For young children with disabilities, the promise of this use remains uncertain (14) though growing optimism has been expressed for expanded use of microcomputers, especially with young children who have severe disabilities (7). Reviews of applications with young disabled children have been reported (13), but little attention has been given to those who are very young and have severe disabilities (12).

A review was conducted of the psychological and rehabilitation literature during the past decade to ascertain the extent to which use of microcomputers with young children with severe disabilities has been reported. These studies have been grouped by areas, and implications for professionals are addressed.

Preferences and Choice Making Through Environmental Control

The use of microcomputers as tools for environmental control by infants and young children with disabilities is a relatively new area of research. Important work on contingency intervention has been described by Brinker and Lewis (3, 4). In one study (4), 21 infants with disabilities and of ages 3 mo. to 4 yr. learned cause and effect relationships using an adapted environmental control system. Employing a system which permitted recording of eight switch activations per minute that triggered up to eight output contingencies, these investigators recorded different body movements and choices made by the children. The children learned to control the consequences in their environment, and they systematically varied their body movements to explore specific contingencies. This study illustrated how microcomputers
