Locke, 2018-01-17 Excerpt from The Fortunate Youth The brood of young Buttons was fed spasmodically and clad at random, but their meals were regular and their raiment well assorted compared with Paul's. Naturally they came in for clouts and thumps like all the children in Budge Street; it was only Paul who underwent organized chastisement. The little Buttons often did wrong, but in the mother's eyes Paul could never do right. In an animal way she was fond of the children. Of Button and in a way equally animal she bore a venomous dislike to the child of Kegworthy. Who and what Kegworthy had been, neither Paul nor any inhabitant of Bludston knew. Once the boy inquired and she broke a worn frying pan over his head. Kegworthy, whoever he might have been, was wrapt in mystery. She had appeared in the town when Paul was a year old, giving herself out as a widow. That she was by no means destitute was obvious from the fact that she at once rented the house in Budge Street.
