"The Dynamics of War and Revolution"

"Continuous revolution is a permanent moral necessity to avert stagnation."

"Since the war of 1914-1918 all that democracy has created of historic importance has been a swift and suicidal internationalism—the dying gap of the commercial and industrial revolution. Since the war is only including nations that have unimpoverished."

"The World War was democracy's last attempt at suicide."

"The present attempt of the democracy at self-destruction has every chance of being one hundred percent successful."

"Until our major war fought by democracy and capitalism must be suicidal and good for either socialism, chaos, or both."

"Democracy has no remedy for the former and the unimpoverished except deficits and debt; it has no alternative but war."

"Democratic and capitalist leadership in America, Britain, and France may be just one real possibility—no stability stagnation."

"Science and technological change is largely held in line as the dynamic problem of capitalism is concerned."

"The reduction of the public debt is no longer possible because it cannot be offset by a corresponding expansion of private debt for now capital."

"In all the great Christian civilizations the main function of Christianity, so far as war has been concerned, has been to neutralize, multiply and intensify war."

"It is impossible to attain the necessary conditions for the successful functioning of private capitalism."

"Democracy in America will finally perish when governments for the first time in a war attempt to control the value of the currency."

"Democracy and a commercial system and order make America a possible ally for the Russians and the British in this post-war whenever it suits their interests."

"One of the hidden facts about the new revolution for Americans as well as British is undoubtedly in that it means the end of the British empire."
