What does empowerment mean to women in northern Ghana? Insights from research around a small-scale irrigation intervention Bryan, Elizabeth, Garner, Elisabeth, 2020-02-04 Women's empowerment is important to improve the status of women and achieve greater gender equity It is also an important vehicle for achieving other development goals related to food security nutrition health and economic growth Increasingly researchers seek ways to measure women's empowerment trace the pathways through which women's empowerment is achieved and provide guidance for policymakers and practitioners aiming to facilitate women's empowerment through their interventions This paper explores local perceptions of empowerment in the Upper East Region of Ghana in the context of a small scale irrigation intervention targeted to men and women farmers Using data collected through qualitative interviews and focus groups the paper traces the linkages between small scale irrigation and aspects of women's empowerment identified as important to men and women farmers themselves The relationship between the components of empowerment and small scale irrigation are placed within a larger context of social change underlying these relationships Finally this paper explores the ways that the introduction of modern technologies for small scale irrigation may contribute to women's empowerment Can market-based approaches to technology development and dissemination benefit women smallholder farmers?

Njuki, Jemimah, Waithanji, Elizabeth, Sakwa, Beatrice, Kariuki, Juliet, Mukewa, Elizabeth, Ngige, John, 2014-07-11 Rural household economies dependent on rainfed agriculture are increasingly turning to irrigation technology solutions to reduce the effects of weather variability and guard against inconsistent and low crop output Organizations are increasingly using market based approaches to disseminate technologies to smallholder farmers and although women are among their targeted group little is known of the extent to which these approaches are reaching and benefiting women There is also little evidence on the implications of women's use and control of irrigation technologies for outcomes including crop choice and income management. This paper reports findings from a qualitative study undertaken in Tanzania and Kenya to examine women's access to and ownership of KickStart pumps and the implications for their ability to make major decisions on crop choices and use of income from irrigated crops. Results from sales monitoring data show that women purchase less than 10 percent of the pumps and men continue to make most of the major decisions on crop choices and income use. These findings vary by type of crop with men making major decisions on high income crops such as tomatoes and women having relatively more autonomy on crops such as leafy vegetables. The study concludes that market based approaches on their own cannot guarantee access to and ownership of technologies and businesses need to take specific measures toward the goal of reaching and benefiting women.
