

When only a portion of the forehead is taken and the entire defect can be closed directly, there is no great advantage in leaving the muscle in that area.

SPECIAL DESIGN FOR BONE GRAFT DONOR AREA

Evans's method of harvesting the bone preserves the skin over the flap and has other advantages. E. A. White prefers the approach because of the experienced lack of such complications as bleeding, infection, contour deformity and distortion. Through a 5 to 6 cm skin incision, the skin over the donor is raised. Two oblique cuts reflect the lips of the skin over behind the anterior superior iliac spine, and perforators are followed from outer and inner surfaces of the ilium. Rectangles thus facilitate harvesting the cortical bone including vertical plates if needed. Two cancellous bone is taken with a curette. After the bone has been harvested, the lips of the cuts are sutured firmly together with a hand suture to approximate the raised lips to the anterior superior spine.

The result is a well-healed site with no postoperative increase of broken bone or tenderness, and the patient can usually walk on the hip or second day after the operation.

CALVARIA BONE GRAFTS

The bone of the calvaria has been used for donor bone grafts but has become of little value lately especially in craniofacial surgery. The bone is usually deficient and available in large amounts of the usual by simply elevating the scalp flap more, without the need for much extra-scapular covering. The outer table of skull with some cancellous bone attached is excellent for grafting the skull and facial deformities, especially at the donor site especially with ear mobility. From a recent experience of harvesting the donor site, we noted that the donor site of the calvaria is shallow, and the bone should be protected by having strips of extra cortex or muscle placed to give strength to the skull donor site and separation and healing have occurred.

BIB GRAFT

Lib bone grafts can be taken with impunity. If the proximal area is left intact and closed, regeneration of all bone will occur.

DONOR AREAS FOR BREAST REPAIR

The latissimus dorsi from the anterior flap is better secondary use is the back of a second or lower rib a year before, by now because this is a good deal better when the rib is one of its patient's ribs, it is partially one of them.
