

Theoretical aspects of designing an integrated management system of industrial, fire and environmental safety of the organization

*Irina Rashoyan

Togliatti State University, Belorusskaya street, 14, Togliatti, Samara region, Russia

Abstract. The article considers the basic theoretical principles, methods and approaches for designing the integrated management system of industrial, fire, environmental and emergency safety of organizations (SMIS). It is shown that for development of all subsystems SMIS it is expedient to apply the processes "Plan-Do-Check-Act" (PDCA) and procedure of process approach applied in ISO. It is also proposed to build graphical diagrams for each process and operation SMIS design in accordance with the basic provisions of the IDEF0 methodology. Application of the above methods will allow the most effective distribution of resources, functional duties and responsibilities of personnel in the overall management system of the organization.

1 Introduction

The problem of ensuring technosphere safety in organizations, enterprises is relevant and important in all its aspects, such as industrial, fire, environmental safety and safety in emergencies (ES) [1-8]. The transport sector of the economy is one of the obvious examples, in which organizations and enterprises are obliged to ensure the solution of a whole set of safety issues. This is due to the frequent movement and handling of dangerous goods by various modes of transportation. In addition, the transportation process is associated with increased risks of emergencies that can lead to fires, emergencies and environmental disasters [3].

The most effective problem of technosphere safety in organizations can be solved by creating system of management of integrated safety (SMIS). Such integrated systems most fully take into account the main features and structure of organizations' activities, technological processes implemented, the danger of substances and materials used. The effectiveness of the implementation of such SMIS is characterized by the ability to ensure environmental, fire and industrial safety, as well as safety in emergencies in organizations. It also ensures stable functioning of production and technological processes, personnel safety and prompt response to emergencies and their consequences. Implementation of SMIS also allows realizing optimal financing of all activities to ensure technosphere safety [5, 6].
