- Theories of attitude change
 - Learning theory: Attitudes may be shaped through classical conditioning, operant conditioning, and observational learning.
 - Cognitive Dissonance theory: inconsistent attitudes cause tension and that people alter their attitudes to reduce cognitive dissonance. LEON FESTINGER is the theorist who explored this.
 - Self-perception theory: People infer their attitudes from their behavior. We behave and then we infer our beliefs from our behaviors. Not the other way around.
 - Elaboration likelihood model: Central routes (when people carefully ponder the content and logic of persuasive messages) to persuasion yield longer-lasting attitude change than peripheral routes (persuasion depends on nonmessage factors such as attractiveness of the source).
