

Deviance:

Deviance	Theory	Explanation
Shoplifting	Strain Theory	Strain theory, developed by Merton (1938), explains deviance as a result of the pressure an individual experiences when they cannot achieve their goals through legitimate means. In this case, shoplifting can be seen as a result of an individual's inability to acquire desired goods through conventional means and their resort to illegal means. This theory highlights the gap between cultural goals and the availability of legitimate means to achieve them.
Substance Abuse	Conflict Theory	Conflict theory, developed by Marx (1848), views deviance as a result of the struggle for power and resources between social classes. In this case, substance abuse can be seen as a manifestation of the lack of resources and opportunities available to individuals in marginalized social groups. This theory highlights the role of social inequality and conflict in shaping deviant behavior.
Murder	Differential association theory	Murder is seen as a result of an individual's associations with others who engage in criminal behavior and the criminal norms and values they learn.
