Efforts to direct the recovery of damaged sites and landscape date back as far as the 1930s. If we fully understood the conditions and controlling variables at restoration sites, we would be better equipped to predict the outcomes of restoration efforts. If there were no constraints, we could merely plant the restoration site and walk away. However      Physical Processes in Tidal Wetland Restoration American Society of Civil Engineers. Runion, 2020

Prime Hook National Wildlife Refuge in Delaware contains over 10,000 acres of tidal wetlands along the coast of lower Delaware Bay. The refuge formerly contained two managed freshwater wetland impoundments but starting in 2009 a series of coastal storms breached the coastal barrier and threatened the ecological integrity of the wetland complex. A restoration project was completed in 2016 to close the breaches and reintroduce regular tidal flow for the first time in decades. Sediment transport and accumulation are critical to maintain newly created tidal flats and stabilize/reestablishing salt marsh vegetation. An observational study of sediment flux was conducted to develop a conceptual model of suspended sediment transport and inform ongoing restoration efforts. Time series of continuous flow and sediment concentration data obtained at four tidal channel locations and nearby meteorological wind/precipitation data were analyzed to identify mechanisms of sediment flux related to tides, wind stress, wave resuspension, and freshwater discharge. Analysis revealed that the post-restoration refuge behaves as a tidally choked coastal lagoon impacted by local and remote winds. Average suspended sediment concentrations (SSC) were high (80-130 mg/L) compared to typical tidal wetlands in the region (10-40 mg/L), perhaps due to resuspension of material from unvegetated tidal flats. High wind speeds generate high SSCs, and both wind speed and tidal action influence the discharge of water. Freshwater discharge from local creeks drove a net export of water, causing a net export in the sediment flux in fair weather conditions. Storm events created both import and export events, but export events were more prevalent. Storms accounted for 20% of the net sediment flux but 44% of the gross sediment flux, indicating that they are not the dominant mechanism but have a high potential for sediment transport. Considering climate change projections predict an increase in storm intensity and frequency, northerly or easterly winds and storm surge contributed to the import of water and sediment while southerly or westerly winds and fair weather conditions contributed to the export Overall the measured sediment flux for the refuge was an export of 5 296 112 metric tons per year

A Synthesis of Environmental and Plant Community Data for Tidal Wetland Restoration Planning in the Lower Columbia River and Estuary, 2013 This report reanalyzes and synthesizes previously existing environmental and plant community data collected by PNNL at 55 tidal wetlands and 3 newly restored sites in the lower Columbia River and estuary LCRE between 2005 and 2011 Whereas data were originally collected for various research or monitoring objectives of five studies the intent of this report is to provide only information that will have direct utility in planning tidal wetland restoration projects

Therefore for this report all tidal wetland data on plants and the physical environment which were originally developed and reported by separate studies were tabulated and reanalyzed as a whole The geographic scope of the data collected in this report is from Bonneville Lock and Dam to the mouth of the Columbia River Hamilton Wetland Restoration Project, 1999
