

An illustration of a classroom scene. A female teacher with dark hair, wearing a blue blazer over a pink top, stands behind a wooden desk, gesturing with her hands as if speaking. In front of her, several diverse students are seated at their desks, viewed from behind. To the left, a large green chalkboard with a wooden frame displays the title 'TEACHERS' RIGHTS IN EDUCATION' in white, bold, sans-serif capital letters. On the chalkboard's ledge, there are several books. To the right of the teacher, five colorful speech bubbles contain text about teachers' rights. The background is a light, neutral color.

The Effects of Teachers' Workplace Experiences on Their Beliefs about Teacher Role in Curriculum and Instructional Change Virginia Louise Miller, 2000 Purpose The purpose of the study was to explore the relationship between teachers experience in the workplace outside of school and their perceptions of the need for a curriculum that is more relevant to workplace demands and instruction that is more problem and experience based Additionally the relationship between changed beliefs and changed classroom practices was examined Specific research questions developed for the study were the following 1 Do teacher participants in a worksite placement change their beliefs about the need to make curriculum more relevant to workplace needs 2 Do teacher participants in a worksite placement change their beliefs about the need to make instruction more problem and experience based 3 Do changed beliefs about curriculum and instruction lead to reported changes in classroom practices If so what new curricular changes and or instructional practices are reportedly applied in the classroom 4 If the practices of some teachers change what are the factors that influenced the changed practices Procedures Participants in the study were a sample of 17 Grade 5 12 teachers from a total population of 85 teachers Grade K 12 who took part in a two week worksite placement outside of school All teachers completed a survey three times over several months and were interviewed twice Hypothesis testing was applied to written survey data gathered from three survey administrations This methodology was used to determine if teachers underwent changes in beliefs about curriculum and instruction subsequent to experiencing the intervention The survey items were selected to identify particular areas of change relating to implicit desirable outcomes of the intervention Qualitative data were obtained through structured interviews and analyzed using thematic analysis to determine if changed beliefs led to reported changed curricular and instructional practices in the classroom Additionally interview questions explored the factors that either promoted or inhibited change based on self reported responses of the participants Results From analysis of both the quantitative and qualitative data it appears that the intervention did have an effect on participants and their beliefs about the need to make curriculum more relevant to workplace demands and instruction more problem and experience based By being immersed in the work environment the participants directly experienced applications of the subjects they teach and were able to bring those back to the classroom along with workplace performance expectations Participants also reported incorporating authentic learning approaches into their instruction and assessment However a comparison of data also indicated that authentic approaches to teaching and assessment coexisted with practices such as lecture and paper and pencil tests

At the same time, there are perceptions that the teaching workforce may be shifting toward a younger and less experienced demographic. These actual and perceived changes raise important questions about the ways teacher education may need to evolve in order to ensure that educators are able to meet the needs of students and provide them with classroom experiences that will put them on the path to future success.
