Historical Significance Johan van Driel, 2024 Historical significance and language are considered important for historical reasoning The studies presented in this dissertation investigate the effects of reading to write and writing strategy instruction on the quality of written text about the significance of historical agents In addition we investigated the effects of our instructions on students procedural knowledge regarding reading reasoning and writing First we explored how 10th grade students assigned significance to a historical agent while thinking aloud We compared their approach with the approach of four history teachers Based on this comparison we developed in the second study reading to write instruction We tested this instruction in 4 classrooms and found that students who received reading to write instruction wrote better texts and had more procedural knowledge compared to students who did not receive this instruction Next we investigated the additional effect of writing strategy instruction above reading to write instruction 6 classes We compared two conditions in one condition students received the reading to write instruction twice and the other condition received reading to write instruction followed by writing strategy instruction The results suggest that although students in both conditions improved their writing and had more procedural knowledge students who received both reading to write and writing strategy instruction improved more An additional think aloud study showed that students who wrote better texts applied more strategies as instructed during the second intervention study compared to students who barely improved Several implications of our findings for the history curriculum and teaching history are discussed throughout this dissertation We recommend the use of contrasting accounts about historical significance in history classrooms
