Script Writing for Radio and Television

M.S. Nain

Division of Agricultural Extension, Indian Agricultural Research Institute, New Delhi 110 012

"Script writing is just as much a craft as interviewing, tape editing and mixing. The script is what makes the information you have gathered. It is the framework for your story. It brings together the most important elements, and helps your audience understand the significance of the points the people you have interviewed have made. Scripts are used to ensure that all the relevant information is included and doesn't go off subject. Scripts are also important for timing, and help to make sure programmes don't overrun or under run. – Writing a script is different to writing a script for TV because the audience will be focusing purely on the audio and not have any visual cues. This has to be taken into account when choosing language and structure. For example, a script couldn't contain the line "Look at that!" without also describing what the person is looking at.

A video script may be defined as the pre-visualized description of the visual and aural elements of a programme. Script writing involves the writing out of complete video programmes in a suitable format. Script writing enables each member of a production unit to understand the requirements of a video programme. Each unit member gives off ones best for achieving the overall objective of the programme. It is a matter of sequencing and time management of the various segments of the subject matter and one will have a clear idea of the total content of the information when it is put down on paper.

Writing for Radio

Radio can be a news report, a commentary, a conversation, an audio postcard, a documentary or a variety of all these and more. Regardless of the format, radio journalism is like storytelling - it is conversational. Radio scripting is a tool that will help you tell your story. Live radio is stressful enough without the burden of having to decide what to say next. It is much better to write your announcements beforehand and then focus entirely on your delivery. Reading material well on-air is not easy. However, with a bit of confidence things will gradually fall into place. When you become proficient, you can replace cues with dot-points for ad-libbing. But if in doubt, script it. It is far better to write something worthwhile and read it stiffly, than "ummmmm" and "ahhhhh" throughout your program. Writing scripts will take you longer for your show but developing loyal listeners makes it worth it! Think of your script as a way of writing what you hear and see in your imagination. It can be used as a guide for live and pre-produced programmes. Your script will be a guide for the host or narrator of an audio piece and/or for the on-air technician/producer who will be mixing your script to tape.

Basic Principles

Language, grammar and punctuation

There is a big difference between radio and print or television stories. Since we can't go back to over like a newspaper, and we don't have the visual images of TV, the radio journalist has to write in a way that can be understood the first time it is read. Below are some basic principles on writing for radio. Language, grammar/punctuation and script layout.
