Readings in Russian Poetics Ladislav Matejka, Krystyna Pomorska, 1978 Slavic Review, 1990 Structuralism/humanism James Norman Roney, 1981 Janusz S I awinski has been writing on literary theory history and methodology for the last twenty years His research has gone virtually unnoticed because from the perspective of Slavic linguistic structuralism it represents a derivative structuralism with eclectic features Those eclectic features reveal S I awinski's belief that individual conscious activity and social interaction create scholarly and literary conventions His scholarship grew out of a Polish emphasis on individual consciousness and the social atmosphere of the Stalinist period The insights which S I awinski's research provides into the nature of literary scholarship allow one to reach the following conclusions The much heralded crisis in the humanities is related to the modern penchant for technological utopia and to the attempt to develop a linguistic science of literature The humanities will continue to exist in an eclectic form as long as human consciousness exists The scientific study of literature actually began with the positivist use of the inductive projective method in the last century Any science of literature which uses only the projective method relies on some form of determinism The non theoretical eclecticism which dominates American literary scholarship relies on public taste to control literary research There are several methodological alternatives within the Slavic formalist structuralist tradition S I awinski combines Roman Ingarden's phenomenology with Witold Gombrowicz's interhuman form and Jan Mukarovsky's structuralism There is a need for intensive research into the methodological diversity and historical origins of Slavic structuralism The American
