

- Stabilise the sex drive- prevents social disruption from 'free-for-all's'.
- Reproduction of the next generation.
- Socialising the young- into shared norms and values.
- Meet members economic needs- food/shelter.

Geographically mobile workforce- industries rise/decline in different areas or overseas, so people move a lot for work. Parsons says the nuclear family is easier to move around and therefore fulfils this function better than the extended family.

Socially mobile workforce- society is constantly evolving, so workforces need to be technically skilled and competent- someone's status in the force depends on talent/ability, not ascribed status based on family.

Parsons- nuclear family fulfils this function better because extended families have sons at home (father has higher status), even though at work they are above him. This causes tensions- the nuclear family fixes as sons move out and form their own socially mobile family.

Argues for 4 essential functions that meet society's and member's needs. Says the nuclear family performs them best.

Murdock (1949)

Functionalism

Industrial society's functions:

Parsons (1955)

Argues a functional fit theory where family functions and structure depend on the type of society they're in.

- Criticisms:
- Functions can be done by other institutions or non-nuclear families
 - Rose-tinted and overly harmonious- Feminists say the family benefits men and exploits women, Marxists say the family meets capitalism's needs, not members or society.

Pre-industrial families were multi-functional, units of production (working together on a family farm) and units of consumption (feeding/clothing members).

Loss of functions:

Even though this family type is more self-sufficient, Parsons argues that a family changes from extended to nuclear when society industrialises, and ends up losing some of its functions and is just a unit of consumption. Other institutions like schools and health service take over.

Here, the nuclear family specialises in 2 essential functions- Primary socialisation of children (skills, society's values, etc) and stabilising adult personalities (family to relax and release tensions in order to go back to work refreshed).

Nuclear family- parents and dependent children, fits modern industrial society. Extended family- 3 generations under one roof, fits pre-industrial society.
