Semiconductor Trade Arrangements of 1986 and the current debate over continuation of elements of that agreement Flamm provides a thorough analysis of this experiment and its consequences for U S semiconductor producers and users and presents extensive discussion of patterns of competition within the semiconductor industry Using a wealth of new data he argues that a fundamentally new trade regime for high technology industries is needed to escape from the present impasse He lays out the alternatives from laissez faire to managed trade and argues strongly for a new set of international ground rules to regulate acceptable behavior by government and firms in high tech industries Flamm s detailed analysis of competition within the semiconductor industry will be of great value to those interested in the industrial organization of high technology industries as well as those concerned with trade and technology policy international competition and Japanese industrial policies
