Troubled Partnership Mark A. Lorell, 1995 The United States has generally tried to discourage its allies from developing their own major weapons systems to promote equipment standardization with U S forces and tie allied security policies more firmly to U S interests Japan s FS X fighter is perhaps the most prominent example of this policy Japan had originally intended to design and build an indigenous fighter the Pentagon urged Japan to buy an existing U S fighter After difficult negotiations the two sides eventually agreed to lightly modify the U S F 16 jointly to meet Japan s special needs But as a result of political controversies over technology transfer and trade the U S side focused increasingly on the economic aspects of the program Under cover of these controversies the Japanese have been able to move the FS X design and technology applications ever farther away from the F 16 toward a much more nearly indigenous creation In the end the FS X program has failed to meet many of the original U S expectations and Japan has reaped an unexpected reward experience in developing a world class fighter aircraft This book summarizes and assesses the program
