Determinants of Tourism and Its Potential for Sustainable Economic Development Christoph Vietze, 2010 Like in several sectors of consumer demand attitudes beliefs and the political environment may also influence the worldwide demand for tourism Consequentially this thesis concentrates on a wider range of determinants including non economical factors of tourism demand and supply in both the country of origin and destination at a worldwide scale So the aim of the thesis was to show how the most relevant economical geographical and socio cultural determinants influence the demand for tourism The second intent was to analyze whether and how sustainable tourism can be a trigger for economic development The thesis comprises four main chapters composed of four single published papers The results show that tourism is able to enhance economic growth in countries specialized in this industry However this requires some special condition in both the country of origin and the country of destination We show that tourism is a superior good as the development level measured by income in the country of origin plays a major role in explaining tourism demand Hence it is evidenced that an increasing willingness to pay for outbound tourism goes hand in hand with an increasing per capita income in the world However cultural openness of a society is an important precondition from the country of origins point of view Regarding the tourism exporting countries countries of destination the most interesting outcome of the thesis is that biodiversity as proxy for nice nature is an important supply factor besides the countries cultural heritages good governance and visitor s safety as well Together with the tourism s potential to enhance economic growth this reflects the value biodiversity can play for economic development Hence the most important requirement for this mechanism is the allocation of property rights on biodiversity to private or public land owners to give them an economic incentive to use their nature sustainably

Tourism as a Tool for Development P. Díaz, 2013-10-30 Some researchers perceive tourism as a process which creates dependency and causes loss of socioeconomic and environmental control and is harmful to traditional sociocultural structures For others it is clearly an opportunity for development and convergence among societies The main consequences of tourism are economic sociocultural and socio ecological ones These directly affect the natural and cultural landscape as well as the inhabitants of the destinations Proper management can unite the local community strengthen the historical memory and promote the recognition that the landscape is a legacy worth preserving If local people can learn to appreciate the need for regulation and careful development of cultural tourism then it is possible to have an alternative to the strategies of convenience based upon the view of tourism only for profit Designing tourism to serve heritage and local sustainable development not only helps to conserve the resources that make it possible but also complies with the ethical duty to guide social perception towards awareness and respect which in turn will lead to sustainability By means of case studies and theoretical developments the authors attempt to present methods designed to minimise the impacts of tourism and encourage its positive effects Some ideas in the book discuss the role of local communities their participation in development management the singularities of community tourism planning local governance and the relationship between socio economic benefits and impacts
