An Examination of Learner-centered Professional Development for Reluctant Teachers Patricia Orchard, 2007 This study focused on professional development practices that empowered reluctant teachers to implement and sustain improved instructional practices Constructs were viewed through the perspective of learner centered principles in order to connect scientifically proven practices for teaching students in the classroom to effective professional development practices for teachers Data for this mixed design study were gathered from the LCPD School Practices Survey transcripts of follow up interviews with once reluctant teachers and school documents Statistical correlations were used to analyze the variables of the quantitative portion of the study Findings indicated that when schools implemented learner centered professional development practices student achievement increased and teacher reluctance toward new practices and change decreased The qualitative data were coded and analyzed and cross referenced with school documents Four themes emerged as to the types of professional development that encouraged reluctant teachers to sustain new practices 1 show them why and how 2 empower them to safely explore 3 emphasize their professional contribution and 4 engage them in meaningful conversations This study calls for additional research to better understand the nature of administrator reluctance toward new practices as well as how the increased leadership capacity for teachers engaged in learner centered professional development impacts the roles and relationships within the traditional educational hierarchy Another area for future research would be to look at how the restructuring of traditional schools into professional learning communities might impact the traditional job categories of public schools

Technology as a Catalyst for School Communities Mary Burns, K.

Victoria Dimock, 2007 Technology as a Catalyst for School Communities Beyond Boxes and Bandwidth tells the story of how three disparate schools handle the many challenges of integrating technology into their classrooms Teachers and administrators alike will share familiar feelings as they watch the professional learning communities progress toward the change that makes an enormous difference in how they teach and learn from each other and their students This book provides an attainable approach for educators to create their own communities of practice for the purposes of school improvement The case studies illustrate how administrators and teachers work together to find solutions to the best ways to integrate technology in the classroom In the process through their collaborative work they discover that they learned much more than the technical skills they first thought would be the focus of their common inquiry In creating their communities of practice the isolation of the classroom is removed new ways of thinking and doing are embraced and they learn how to learn again As the teachers reach out to their peers and students giving and receiving support in a cooperative learning endeavor a new enthusiasm permeates their schools The Rural Educator ,1980 State Plan for Professional Development of School Staffs ,1977 Teaching What They Learn, Learning What They Live Brad Olsen,2015-11-17 Cogent interesting and provocative from the foreword by Ann Lieberman Teaching What They Learn Learning What They Live explores the multiple social political and epistemological domains that comprise learning to teach Based on a study of eight beginning English teachers at four different university teacher preparation programs this book examines the ways in which beginning teachers personal dispositions and conceptions combines with their teacher preparation programs professional knowledge and contexts to form their understandings of and approaches toward teaching Brad Olsen recasts learning to teach as a continuous situated identity process in which prior experiences produce deeply embedded ways of viewing the world that go on to organize current future experience into meaning Since experience shapes learning and everyone acquires different sets of experience no individual teacher s knowledge is exactly like another s Yet Olsen shows also that the process by which a teacher constructs professional knowledge is common the what of teacher knowledge varies but the how remains the same
