Yang,2017 Beliefs about whether effort pays off govern some of the most fundamental choices individual make This paper uses China s Cultural Revolution to understand how these beliefs can be affected how they impact behavior and how they are transmitted across generations During the Cultural Revolution China s college admission system based on entrance exams was suspended for a decade until 1976 effectively depriving an entire generation of young people of the opportunity to access higher education the lost generation Using data from a nationally representative survey we compare cohorts who graduated from high school just before and after the college entrance exam was resumed We find that members of the lost generation who missed out on college because they were born just a year or two too early believe that effort pays off to a much lesser degree even 40 years into their adulthood However they invested more in their children s education and transmitted less of their changed beliefs to the next generation suggesting attempts to safeguard their children from sharing their misfortunes
