

moment. As the battle between two sides progresses, the composition of the black drop is changing and its viscosity is increasing. The speed with which the soda cell through its allotted time depends on the temperature of the reacting ions. At about 50 degrees, Fahrenheit the mortal struggle lasts about 45 minutes and then the imitation cell becomes quiet and quiet, and has changed an exciting "creature" to a little soap.

OTHER forces besides those of osmotic pressure come into play in the lives of his colpoids, Professor Herrera explains, and these are the equal forces of surface tension and electrical charges in the drops which have a surface tension like their like in the real world.

Surface tension is the force which causes the spherical shape of the colpoids, but the currents induced by the chemical interchange of ions are the real forces of life.

In order to understand the behavior of these artificial organisms further, Professor Herrera's experiments are analogous to those of living cells, he suggests. In his experiments, he suggests, the colpoids are not to be compared to the real world, but to the world of the colpoids, which he has neglected to mention. He sets an artificial limit of growth in the colpoids, and in the world of soda solution might be suggested. The physical forces and electrical properties of the reacting bodies then become the real forces of life.

Professor Herrera's colloid cell of soda solution is a spectacular artificial "creature," he has mimicked many other structures by means of other chemical substances. He has used organic acids, albumin and fats, but he discovered that his best results were obtained when certain mineral imceeded in obtaining in his microscope slide structures resembling isolated cells, spores, streptococcus chains, bacteria, and protoplasm.

One of his simplest methods of preparing a pseudo-protoplasm in his laboratory today is by sprinkling a bit of Merck's chemically prepared powdered egg albumin upon a drop of nitric acid on a microscope slide. Remarkably realistic structures arise which appear almost identical with the structure of living protoplasm. By varying the acid, Professor Herrera can vary the type of protoplasmic structure.

"These various experiments are not without biological significance," Pro-get its food. In the arm-like extensions of black soda drop which it uses to vampire grip on its rivals, Professor Herrera sees the counterparts of pseudopods of the living amoeba in the brook. And in the pseudopods' behavior of the organism becomes and more complicated, the physical and chemical reactions come so confused with what are instincts, at the bottom of which must lie, that they are completely lost.

the scale of life is ascended and the behavior of the organism becomes and more complicated, the physical and chemical reactions come so confused with what are instincts, at the bottom of which must lie, that they are completely lost.

The struggles of a man to get by robbing a bank or getting in another factory are as much the result of internal chemical reactions as the behavior of the caterpillar or the hydra in the brook, the amoeba in the sunny pool, or the black drop skipping about in the microscope. Professor Herrera Professor Herrera's conclusion is the result of 30 years' work in the field of colloid chemistry, which is a field of hitherto unexplored territory. The attention of the scientific world.
