

Understanding urban plant phenology for sustainable cities and planet

To the Editor — Alongside the unparalleled changes in global climate, our home planet is experiencing an unprecedented period of urbanization, which is expected to continue across the next few decades. For plants, the impacts of urbanization, such as altered air quality, light regimes and water and nutrient availability, can induce large shifts in phenology (the timing of recurring life events¹) with consequences for fitness, and for the ecological, climate, health and economic services that plants provide. Additionally, urbanization can elevate temperature and carbon dioxide (CO₂) concentration (Fig. 1a), which can mimic or magnify impacts of climate change. Understanding urban plant phenology is necessary to protect plants, cities and occupants under future change.

The broad impacts of urbanization on plant phenology can include advanced spring leaf-out and flowering, delayed autumn senescence and extended growing-season length^{2–4} (Fig. 1b). These shifts can have benefits, such as increased cropping seasons for urban agriculture⁵ or improved vegetation-based cooling in urban areas⁶. However, faster growth of urban trees due to extended growing-season length may lead to shortened lifetimes compared to trees in rural areas⁷. The advancement of spring leaf-out can also increase plant vulnerability to spring frost damage⁸ and cause phenological mismatches, resulting in loss of pollination services and biological control of plant pests⁹. Moreover, phenology changes in cities have important cultural and economic implications by shifting significant events (for example, cherry blossoms and maple foliage)¹⁰ and can impact human health (for example, through changes in allergenic pollen release)¹¹. Overall,

Fig. 1 Understanding plant phenology in global cities: implications, challenges and opportunities. a,b, Changes in environmental factors (for example, temperature and light) in urban areas (a) lead to shifted spatiotemporal patterns of plant phenology (b). c,d, An improved understanding of urban phenology is important not only because of the consequences of phenological changes in urban areas (c), but also for its implications in the prediction of carbon and water cycles of the Earth system using cities as natural laboratories (d). e, New spatial data and technologies for monitoring urban phenology and environmental factors provide unique opportunities to address current challenges.
