a general use cell based middle out biology emulation programming framework outlining a programming paradigm is presented that enables biologists to emulate and use virtual biological systems of previously unimaginable complexity and potentially get results accurate enough to be used in research and ultimately in clinical practice such as diagnosis or operations With this technology virtual organisms can be created that are viable fit and can be optimised for any task that arises The tool realised with a programming framework created for the C language is detailed and demonstrated through several examples of increasing complexity namely several example organisms and a cancer emulation showing both viable virtual organisms and usable experimental results
