

Vygotsky's Social Development Theory

Low Vygotsky stresses the significance of social interactions and cultural context to the learner. Humans develop from a certain culture (e.g. in their language or writing), and these functions are eventually internalized as higher-order thinking skills as the learner gets more mature.

Development

The learning and thinking abilities are shaped by social interactions or conversations with others. The focus is more on social interaction and growth than on the individual's cognitive development and learning for personal value.

We can't just learn to read from books all by ourselves. That is, just as you don't try to learn to use a computer "by" yourself, you can't learn to read without someone to show you how and when the language is used. You can't learn to read without someone to show you how and when the language is used.

Culture is crucial in shaping our beliefs and attitudes. We learn to understand language and other interactions, but we internalize values and other "socially-constructed" behaviors.

Zone of proximal development: This is the gap between what the learner can do independently and what he or she can do with the assistance of an adult or better.

As children learn to read, they become an expert with construction toys. The expert can be used to do the task with a child. Children are always and constantly interacting with the world as they learn to read and understand the world.

COOPERATION: Children often do not do it alone. They are in a culture that helps them to learn to read together. They are always interacting with others and these interactions are what help them to learn to read. They are always interacting with others and these interactions are what help them to learn to read.

Writing

Writing's function is to make explicit the thoughts and things others do. It is a social activity. Writing is a way to share thoughts and things others do. It is a social activity. Writing is a way to share thoughts and things others do.

Reading

Reading's function is to give a person a way to understand and share thoughts and things others do. It is a social activity. Reading is a way to share thoughts and things others do. It is a social activity. Reading is a way to share thoughts and things others do.

Learning

Individuals develop because they are always interacting with others. They are always interacting with others and these interactions are what help them to learn to read and understand the world.

In The Classroom

Learning is a social activity. It is always done with others. It is always done with others and these interactions are what help them to learn to read and understand the world.

Writing is a social activity. It is always done with others. It is always done with others and these interactions are what help them to learn to read and understand the world.
