Framework for Analyzing the Success of Open Source Software Arun Chockalingam, 2011 Abstract The open source industry has grown by leaps and bounds over the past decade The concept of open source has been beneficial to a lot of people and has also proven to be a learning platform It has forced the commercial organizations to change their business models However while some open source software has been enormously successful most of it fails An estimate is that almost 90% of all Open Source software fails This has led to a lot of research on the factors that contribute to the factors of open source Software OSS Most of the existing research has been exploratory or case study based in nature while some of it has been empirical The majority of existing work has focused on one particular factor for OSS success or has been a case study of one or two particular projects Even though there has been lot of research in this topic there is no clear method described on how a project administrator or sponsor could use this information to analyze his own project and improve it We address this need by creating a framework of measures that can be used to analyze the success of any OSS project This can be used by prospective and current developers and sponsors to analyze their project and improve it based on the results to make it successful We also provide guidelines on collecting data for applying the framework Finally we also apply the framework on two case study projects namely KANSEI and JFtp discuss the results of the analysis and suggest areas of improvements We also perform a preliminary analysis of a third project namely the On time Measure project and discuss the results of the analysis
