Social Media Data and Ethics in Social Research Matthew Williams, Pete Burnap, Luke Sloan, 2020. A sizable portion of social interactions produced on social media networks is relevant to social science research questions. See Moat et al. 2014 for an overview. However, these data present significant ethical challenges when used in research. The ethics of using Web 1.0 Internet data, defined as static, noninteractive website data in social research, is well debated. Fielding et al. 2016. Stewart Williams 2005. The advent of Web 2.0 Internet technologies, which facilitate the production of interactive data between individuals, reopened these debates. The ethical challenges brought about by the collection, storage, analysis, and representation of social media data in academic and government research forms the basis of this entry. The rapid uptake of social media has outpaced parallel developments in research.
