

A group of people, likely from a traditional or indigenous culture, are shown from the chest up, looking upwards towards a night sky. They are wearing dark, textured clothing. The sky is filled with stars and the prominent band of the Milky Way galaxy, which has a reddish-orange hue. The overall scene is dark and atmospheric, suggesting a moment of reflection or observation of the cosmos.

What was most striking about the long course of human events, Truman had concluded from his reading of history, were its elements of continuity, including, above all, human nature, which had changed little if at all through time. "The only new thing in the world is the history you don't know," he would one day tell an interviewer.
