the village I say it stood there many years ago but it is very likely that it is still standing as it was a firm well built house of hewn logs carefully chinked and plastered between the chinks with run lime It was roofed with cedar shingles that projected at the eaves so as to cast off the rain and keep the walls dry It was what in that country is called a double house that is a large passage ran across the middle of it through which you might have driven a wagon loaded with hay This passage was roofed and ceiled like the rest of the house and floored with strong planks The flooring elevated a foot above the surface of the ground projected several feet in front of the passage where carved uprights of cedar wood supported a light roof forming a porch or verandah Around these uprights and upon the railing that shut in the verandah clung vines rose bushes and convolvulus plants that at certain seasons of the year were clustered over with beautiful flowers The house faced the river standing as I have said on its western bank on the same side with Point Coup e In front was a lawn some two hundred yards in length that stretched toward the river and ended on the low bluff forming its bank This lawn was enclosed by high rail fences and variegated with clumps of shrubbery and ornamental trees Most of them were indigenous to the country but there were exotics as well Among the trees you could not fail to notice the large flowered magnolia Magnolia grandiflora the red mulberry Morus rubra the pale green leaves of the catalpa the tall tulip tree liriodendron and the shining foliage of the orange
