Everyone is familiar with the old fashioned stereoscope where two pictures are viewed through a lens arrangement allowing the eyes to see them as one What is probably less familiar is the fact that these two pictures are not alike They correspond to the separate views seen by the right and left eye of the observer The scene appears to have a third dimension depth when this pair of pictures is viewed together because each eye sees only the picture taken from the normal viewpoint of that eye A single picture can show us only what we would see with one eye Stereoscopic pictures all need some sort of mechanical arrangement to make them appear as one If such a pair of pictures were projected on a screen each observer would require a viewing box adjusted to suit his distance from the screen as well as the personal peculiarity of his eyes thus permitting each of his eyes to see its proper picture      Current Opinion Edward Jewitt Wheeler, Frank Crane,1913
