

Vygotsky's Social Development Theory

Lev Vygotsky stresses the significance of social interactions and cultural context to the learner. Humans develop from a certain culture (e.g. in their language or writing), and these functions are eventually internalized as higher-order thinking skills as the learner gets more mature.

Development

The learning and thinking abilities are shaped by social interactions or conversations with others. The focus is more on social interaction and growth than on the individual's cognitive development and learning for personal value.

We can't just learn to read from books all by ourselves. That is, just as you don't try to learn to use a computer "by" yourself, you can't learn to read without someone to show you how and when the language is used. You can't just sit and read a book and learn to read without someone to help you.

Culture is crucial in shaping our beliefs and attitudes. We learn to understand language and other interactions, but we internalize values and other "socially-constructed" behaviors.

Zone of proximal development: This is the gap between what the learner can do independently and what he or she can do with the guidance of an adult or better.

As children learn to read, they become an expert with construction toys. As adults can be used for an hour to teach a child to read, an expert can transfer information to the child as appropriate for the child's level of understanding.

COOPERATION: happens when the teacher or older student projects a model and guides the student to complete the task. The teacher or older student works with the student to complete the task. The teacher or older student provides a model. The teacher or older student provides a model.

Writing

Writing's function is to work against the transient and change nature of verbal interaction. Writing permanently records ideas that would otherwise be lost. It also provides a record of knowledge. It also does not interfere with the use of language without disrupting it.

Reading

Reading's function is to give a person a new knowledge perspective. Reading is a tool for understanding the world. These words are not just to be read, but to be used. Reading is not just to be read, but to be used. Reading is not just to be read, but to be used. Reading is not just to be read, but to be used.

Learning

Individuals develop because they are social. They are not just individuals, but they are social. They are not just individuals, but they are social. They are not just individuals, but they are social.

In The Classroom

Learning happens in the classroom. It is not just a classroom, but it is a classroom. It is not just a classroom, but it is a classroom. It is not just a classroom, but it is a classroom.
