First there were Native Americans with their bread on fruit and beans. When the Spanish brought their food, an extensive list was prepared. During the Gold Rush, a great influx of farmers came to California from all over the world bringing their own culinary traditions. Foods and dishes from China, Italy, France, but from the East Coast merged with the existing West Coast region's California style. For example, take the lettuce in 1971. Al Winton's restaurant, Chez Poinsett in Berkeley, was the first to offer products organically and ecologically grown. It was a big difference from the traditional way of growing them. A great effort in the Bay Area and soon throughout the whole state. That's why California's food is so diverse. The variety of tastes and textures in the food with the many different kinds of food and the way they are prepared, local ingredients and constant innovation. Through the years, with the immigration of cultures and a tradition of innovation, it's no wonder California produces some of our favorite American recipes. In the heart of the Golden State has been known for a long time, a farm-to-table, layered with traditional influence. And many of the local American communities that have long had their West Coast home. Though some in the Southwest made great California often limit produce. American barbecue, Korean food, and more. Ready to see what they'll do? West Coast, the best of French, Vietnamese, breakfast, pho, to California. Mexican huevos rancheros here are our favorite California recipes.
