Structural Economics:

Structural Economics Faye Duchin, 1998 In all societies the main causes of environmental degradation are resource extraction and the generation of wastes by households and industries Realistic strategies for mitigating these impacts require an understanding of both the technologies by which resources are transformed into products and the lifestyle choices that shape household use of such products Structural Economics provides a framework for developing and evaluating such strategies It represents an important new approach to describing household lifestyles and technological choices the relationships between them and their impact on resource use and waste In this volume economist Faye Duchin provides for the first time an authoritative and comprehensive introduction to the field including its social as well as its technological dimensions The presentation is accessible to non specialists while also including a substantial amount of new research Duchin s primary achievement is to integrate a qualitatively rich understanding of technologies and lifestyles into a flexible quantitative framework grounded in established principles of input output economics and social accounting She uses tools and insights from areas as diverse as demography and market research to conceptualize and describe different categories of households and their lifestyles She also draws on the expertise of engineers and physical scientists to examine the potential for technological change The framework Duchin develops permits the rigorous and detailed analysis of specific scenarios for alternative technologies and changes in lifestyle The author uses the case of Indonesia for illustration and to refine new concepts by testing their relevance against factual information The new field of structural economics represents an important step forward in the effort to apply the power of science to solving the problems of modern societies This book should prove invaluable to students and scholars of economics sociology or anthropology as well as environmental scientists policymakers at all levels and anyone concerned with a practical interpretation of the elusive concept of sustainable development

New Structural Economics Justin Yifu Lin, 2010

New Structural Economics Justin Y. Lin, 2017 As strategies for achieving sustainable growth in developing countries are re examined in light of the financial crisis it is critical to take into account structural change and its corollary industrial upgrading Economic literature has devoted a great deal of attention to the analysis of technological innovation but not enough to these equally important issues The new structural economics outlined in this paper suggests a framework to complement previous approaches in the search for sustainable growth strategies It takes the following into consideration First an economy s structure of factor endowments evolves from one stage of development to another Therefore the optimal industrial structure of a given economy will be different at different stages of development Each industrial structure requires corresponding infrastructure both hard and soft to facilitate its operations and transactions Second each stage of economic development is a point along the continuum from a low income agrarian economy to a high income industrialized economy not a dichotomy of two economic development stages poor versus rich or developing versus industrialized Industrial upgrading and infrastructure improvement targets in developing countries should not necessarily draw from those that exist in high income countries Third at each given stage of development the market is the basic mechanism for effective resource allocation However economic development as a dynamic process requires industrial upgrading and corresponding improvements in hard and soft infrastructure at each stage Such upgrading entails large externalities to firms transaction costs and returns to capital investment Thus in addition to an effective market mechanism the government should play an active role in facilitating industrial upgrading and infrastructure improvements
