Cathodic Protection of Offshore Structures Alexander Arnfinn Olsen, 2025-02-07 Cathodic protection when used in conjunction with protective coatings is a common method used to protect immersed parts of steel surfaces from corrosion This text offers detailed recommendations on cathodic protection for offshore structures Traditional seagoing vessels dock at regular intervals but offshore structures such as Floating Production Storage and Offloading structures FPSOs are stationary and are in continuous operation for prolonged periods of time Therefore the design of the corrosion protection for a 15 year or longer service life of a floating offshore structure requires special consideration Some Floating Production Installations FPIs have hull designs similar to oil tankers especially those converted from oil tankers Others are designed and built as floating production platforms Cathodic protection systems are to consider the structure to be protected as a whole as well as individual components which are attached to the structure The information presented in the text is intended solely to assist the reader in the methodologies and or techniques discussed This text does not and cannot replace the analysis and or advice of a qualified professional It is the responsibility of the reader to perform their own assessment and obtain professional advice Information contained in this text is considered to be pertinent at the time of publication but may be invalidated as a result of subsequent legislation regulations standards methods and or more updated information and the reader assumes full responsibility for compliance

Fire Protection Structure and Systems Design ,1982 Protecting Structures in the Wildland/Urban Interface David H. Cowardin,2008-03-01 This guide is to be used by instructors to teach an eight hour course of structure protection in the wildland urban interface Students will be taught the following recognize conflagration potential of the initial attack fire situation identify structures that have a high potential for loss reduce loss of life and prevent injuries and Recognize wildland fire behavior characteristics and fire control procedures This guide is to be used with the Student Workbook and DVD that either are or will be available here under the same title

Permanent Passive Fire Protection Against Wildland-urban Interface Fires Makenzie Wilson,2023 The average intensity and frequency of wildland fires have been on the rise over the years leading to an increase in the risk to homes located in the Wildland Urban Interface WUI Fire suppression is the most used method of wildland fire control but this suppression can cause wildland fires to become more frequent and devastating Increased development in the WUI also puts these homes at greater risk Current methods of passive fire protection are effective but these methods are expensive time consuming to set up and not fully effective This research proposes a permanent passive fire protection system that is built into the structure A flame resistant material would be attached to the sheathing with the roofing and siding attached over the material This system would allow the easily replaceable exterior components of the structure to burn and the interior of the structure would be protected This system protects the structural supports of the building so the house does not collapse and the exterior components can be replaced To test this permanent passive fire protection system 21 small scale specimens were constructed with five different flame resistant materials and three different types of siding The flame resistant materials include structural wrap Kaowool ceramic fiber insulation Pyrogel and intumescent paint The sidings include wood siding vinyl siding and hardie board The testing took place in a burn room to simulate the conditions of a wildland fire Post burn charring evaluations and temperature analyses were conducted to determine which type of material and siding were most effective at protecting the small scale models The charring evaluation included determining the percent charring of the OSB face of the specimens and the temperature analysis included determining the percent difference between the internal and external temperatures of the specimens The performance cost and installation constructability and replaceability of each of the materials were considered in deciding which materials were most effective Overall the Pyrogel outperformed the other materials but this material is by far the most expensive The ceramic fiber material was overall the second most effective flame resistant material and this material could be as effective as the Pyrogel if used in conjunction with the other materials tested Further testing of material combinations is required to determine if different flame resistant material combinations could be as effective as the Pyrogel material on its own The results of this project did prove the feasibility of a permanent passive fire protection system but further testing of large scale specimens is required to test the effectiveness of the system in more complex circumstances
