Innate potentialities require experience to become knowledge Alexander Borodin,2012-08-24 Research Paper undergraduate from the year 2012 in the subject Philosophy Theoretical Realisation Science Logic Language grade 69 University of Essex Department of Philosophy language English abstract Does our notion of knowledge necessitate that it becomes manifest firstly in our thinking and then in our actions or can it on the contrary exist in a latent hidden way within us and still be considered knowledge Given the exceeding ambiguity behind the term knowledge we will need in the first place a clear definition of knowledge that should in turn enable us to bring focus to our investigation on the whole In the course of this work we will take a look at the main arguments Plato and Leibniz put forward in this regard particularly focusing on their varying concept of innate knowledge and its relation to experience and our capacity to reason In what will follow I shall argue that even if we are able to identify certain instances of pre existing knowledge or understanding it will anyway remain inextricably connected to the experiences we make in our environment Thereby there must be a coincidence of innate capacities and certain outer circumstances for knowledge to emerge and become visible Otherwise the presence of knowledge isn t at any rate recognizable in the real world but exists in an inactivated hidden mode without the respective person even becoming conscious of its existence
