

Strategy & Environment 2.1

Chapter 1 – Introduction

The most fundamental distinction made in this book is between:

Strategy process – The manner in which strategies come about. Strategy process is concerned with the how, who and when of strategy: how is, and should, strategy be made, analysed, dreamt-up, formulated, implemented, changed and controlled; who is involved; and when do the necessary activities take place? Usually a split is made between the strategy analysis, the strategy formulation stage and the strategy implementation stage. In the analysis stage, strategists identify the opportunities and threats in the environment, as well as the strengths and weaknesses of the organization. Next, in the formulation stage, strategists determine which strategic options are available to them, evaluate each and choose one. Finally, in the implementation stage, the selected strategic option is translated into a number of concrete activities, which are then carried out. The assumption that this process is linear, rational and comprehensive has all been challenged. Strategic thinking, strategy formation and strategic change are different aspects of the strategy process, which are strongly linked and partially overlapping.

Strategy content – The product of a strategy process. Strategy content is concerned with the what of strategy: what is, and should be, the strategy for the company and each of its constituents units? The most common level of aggregation made in the strategic management is between the functional, business and corporate levels. Strategy issues at the functional level refer to questions regarding specific functional aspects of a company (operations strategy, marketing strategy, financial strategy, etc.). Strategy at the business level requires the integration of functional level strategies for a distinct set of products and/or services intended for a specific group of customers. Often companies only operate in one such business, so that this is the highest level of aggregation within the firm. However, there are also many companies that are in two or more businesses. In such companies, a multi-business or corporate level strategy is required, which aligns the various business level strategies. Firms often cluster together into groups of two or more collaborating organizations. This level is referred to as a the multi-company or network level. When a strategy is developed for a group of firms, this is called a network level strategy. In reality, these three levels of strategy do not exist as tidy categories, but are strongly interrelated and partially overlapping. As a consequence, the three sets of strategy issues identified above are also linked to one another.

Strategy context – The set of circumstances under which both the strategy process and the strategy content are determined. Strategy context is concerned with the where of strategy: where (that is in which firm and which environment) are the strategy process and strategy content embedded? Every strategy context is unique. It is usually wise for managers to strive for a fit between the strategy process, strategy content and the specific circumstances prevalent in the strategy context. But the key strategic issues have to do with the question whether the organizational circumstances largely determine the strategy process and strategy content followed, or whether the strategist has a significant amount of control over
