Abstract. This article examines the problem of protecting women's rights in Africa. The foundations and traditions of African society create a lot of obstacles to the socialization of women in a modern society. Many women are deprived of the most essential things - a decent education, access to all necessary health services, good treatment and social status, the ability to independently manage their lives, and participate in government. African states have adopted a number of acts that enshrine fundamental rights and freedoms for women at the legislative level, but their implementation in practice faces a strong tradition and a lack of resources. The situation was further complicated by the spread of the COVID-19 pandemic, disrupting economic and social ties in African society. The article provides recommendations for overcoming these obstacles and creating prerequisites for establishing gender equality in the region.

Introduction

Despite the various breakthrough achievements of humankind, the problem of gender inequality remains relevant nowadays. With a few exceptions, the problem is most acute in developing regions such as Africa, parts of Asia and Latin America. This problem is an important part of the global agenda, since it is multi-component and affects other global problems of humankind, in particular, the problems of food shortages and health care.

In this article, we will consider the prospects for the development of women's rights on the African continent. We will note the results achieved, highlight the key challenges of our time and consider the ways to solve them that are suitable in our opinion, which, in turn, will give an impetus to an improvement in the picture in the region as a whole.

1. Progress

1.1. The notion of women`s right issue

As we mentioned in the introduction, the problem of protecting women's rights is multifaceted. In a 2014 publication by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, all components are detailed. Cases of violation of women's rights include discrimination based on gender or age, ethnic origin or citizenship, restricting women's access to education or health services, and creating artificial barriers to women from holding high positions in public and private structures. Sexual exploitation and domestic violence against women can also be classified as manifestations of gender inequality [1].

1.2 African legislative efforts to cope with gender inequality

At the legislative level, an active fight against discrimination in relation to women and girls has been going on over the past two decades. And the African region is no exception. If for the world community as a whole, the fundamental document in this area is the Beijing Declaration of 1995, which proclaimed the need to eradicate gender discrimination in all its manifestations, then for African countries such document is the Maputo Protocol to the African Charter on Human and People's Rights, signed in 2005.

According to this protocol, in all countries of the African Union, i.e. throughout the African region, it was proclaimed to end discrimination against women and grant them fundamental rights and freedoms. The importance of the Maputo Protocol is underlined by many experts and diplomats, in particular Winnie Mwanjala, Charge d'Affaires of the Republic of Kenya. So, as part of her speech at MGIMO University, the Diplomat said that thanks to the ratification of the Protocol in her home country of Kenya, they approach the fight against discrimination against women very responsibly. In particular, there is a Foundation for the Development of Entrepreneurship among Women, which issues loans to women who want to open and develop business [2].

At the same time, despite some positive cases, we are forced to state that the efforts undertaken over the past 15 years and the enormous funds mobilized have not yielded the desired result, especially on the African continent. Here are some statistics: in sub-Saharan Africa, girls still face barriers to enrolment in primary and secondary school. In North Africa, women hold less than one in five paid non-farming jobs [3]; among developing regions, maternal mortality was highest in 2019 in sub-Saharan Africa, with 438 deaths per 100,000 live births. In sub-Saharan Africa, the region most affected by the HIV epidemic, only 28% of young
